The claimed invention

The present invention solves the problem of loading huge game application programs into cellular phone devices. The solution reduces the communication load of the mobile communications network.

A cellular mobile phone establishes a local connection to a download module. Via the public switched telephone network a game is downloaded from a server.

The following documents were cited in the International Search Report:

D1: US 2002061013 A1
 D2: WO 0189155 A1
 D3: WO0159622 A2
 D4: US2003078986 A1

D1 discloses a system for downloading data, e.g. multimedia, (page 6 paragraph [0079]). A mobile device can make a local connection, e.g. via Bluetooth to a public phone. The public phone is connected to a provider, (figure 11, page 4 paragraph [0057] - page 5 paragraph [0060]).

D2 also describes a system for downloading software to a mobile device by using a short range transceiver, (page 4 lines 12-14) from a hotspot network location, (claim 1). The hotspot network location is connected to a server via the internet. Additionally, in one embodiment, data is downloaded via a home base station connected to the public switch telephone network, (page 16).

D3-D4 are considered to merely disclose the state of the art and are not commented on further.

Reasoned statement

The single general inventive step of claims 1-2, 13 and 15-17 is to download software from a server by using a local connection and the public switched telephone network. This is known from D1.

It is obvious that the download module in the claims may be a public phone, as in D1, or a home base station, as in D2.

Claims 1-2, 10-11, 13-17 also define that game software is downloaded. However, it is obvious to a person skilled in the art to use the methods of downloading multimedia or other software files in D1 and D2, while downloading game software. Consequently, the invention according to claims 1-2, 10-11, 13-17 is not considered to involve an inventive step.

As claimed in claims 4-8 and 12, the cellular mobile phone or the server initiates. This is an obvious measure to a person skilled in the art. Storing the game software in an interchangeable mass storage is also an obvious measure.

Accordingly, claims 4-9 and 12 are considered to lack an inventive step.
